personalties which he has lavished on her? Did not his opening counsel say before you, that he could make the colour fade upon this lady's cheek, and wish that she might be in court to hear Mim? regret that her own son was not here present to testify against her? Was not this monstrous personality? And when it is considered that before this very cause drew near its close, the other counsel of this same defendant rose and sold you that they admitted her character was spotless, and for that reason that no reproach was cast upon u, desire you to acquir their innocent chent, who is a mere historian, who never could have malice, who was more ready to rectify his errors than others to observe them.

But it is well, and I am glad that I was interrupted; for the very evil geni-us that waits upon his life has here for once worked to an honest end. whilst my voice was almost chooked with crowding truths struggling for utterance, and whilst the swell of honest indignation rese even to suffocation, he came forward and pointed my attention to that subject which first described relaiks.

I had said that in the catalogue of crimes, none could be found more base than his. Not treason, for the reasons I have given. Not murder-for he who murders life, murders all sorrow with it; but he has doomed this lady to days of sorrow and to Hogering death The pirate meets his foe or seeks his prey when death or danger stare him in the face; and when he falls before the sword of justice, some sympathy may mingle with his shame, and men regret that one so brave in manly enterprize should fall so ignominiously. But here is an attack upon a woman, far from her husband's side, from friends and home, whose infant sous are yet too tender to avenge their mother's wrongs. The forger who counterfeits some instrument to cheat you of your money, for that crime spins out his wretched days in hard c ptivity. in infamy and labor: will you compare his crime with that of one who, by Labricated his orles, pillers from helpless woman the only precious jewel which she prizes, her more than life, her all her spotless honor? That which the robber or thief purloins, may be retrieved, or may be spared; but not the worth of twenty thousand beings such as this it belier, were he worth twenty thousand times as much as ever he will be, reform how he may, would pay the twen ty thousandth part of that which he has takén: The libeller who writes against abuse of unjust power, who vindicates the cause of liberty and right, when he exceeds through zeal for liberty, or through the warmth of opposition, or even a stubborn spient, le often groud, and sometimes though found guilty, he still has friends that honor and respect him. But the historian who takes such pains to rake up filth from every dirty and polluted source, to make a history of which the scandal may enhance the sale, is a corrupt malicious slanderer, without one circumstance that can excuse or palliate.

I had almost forgot—it is set up as his defence that he is an historian. It is the first time that I ever heard a rule of law so dangerous as that a gazetteer who strings a number of articles together; strewed up and down in form of commu nications, paragraphs, and notes, that overrun his feeble text like brambles shooting across and up and down in some rank uncultivated soil; that this man has any privilege to libel names fairer than his own. Is it because his sheets are stitched together in octavo form and covered with some pasteboard, that therefore he is privileged in slander? It would have been weil, some days ago, if his brother editors, against whom he got damages for being his historian and calling him a Fairsh emissary, had sold their works in boards; they might mest readily have found as many witnesses, and full as good as he has called to say, not that it was true, but they nad inquired and were told it, and verily believed it. They might have said it first themselves, if they had been corrupt enough to do it, then received it ry, not of Tom Paine, but of that greater man who rendered a wondrous benefit to succumbing faith by putting him down after the grave digger had just put him

It is argued that every thing should be intended in favor of this defendant who has written so godly a work against the prince of deists, and for the holy gospel. I am sorry to hear such arguments advanced; they go almost to butlesque religion itself. He a man of God! He write for the love of God! His book a godly book! a vile obscene, and filthy compilation, which bears throughout the character of rancorous matice, and trainples upon every christian charity. Libel an innocent woman, lie and calumniate, for the sake of christianity! If this be the only godly deed this man has done, I pray to Heaven to be more merciful to him than he has been to Mrs. Bonneville, and that for this very work of godliness he be not damned If you be christian jurors, punish him; for be assured of this, that twenty Pames, were twenty such just now upon this earth, could not conjointly do more harm to christianity by their most violent efforts, than this man by defending it would do. If any one of wavering faith should hear that the best vindication of God's word was this most libellous and scandalous work, he never would be christian from that hour. Not every one that saith Lord, Lord, shall enter the kingdom of Heaven, but least of all he that makes the blessed name of God a clock for malice and iniquity. He may be like those here to vindicate her house from those I priests of whom we read in history, who personalties which he has lavished on with the holy cross in one hand, and the bloody sabre in the other, commit attre-cities at which nature shudders. Where did he learn that the God of mercy took delight in human sacrafices, and that to do nim bonor a woman's heart should palpitate upon a bloody:attar? Has he ever read the word of God, or, this head yeally historian, does he know one letter of the gospel history? If he does he is as blunt and dull in understanding as he to dead to sensibility and delicacy. When a woman was brought before the author of the christian faith, taken in the very feet of adultery, what did he say? He left behind him a lesson of tendemess ever memorable and divine. Let him, he said to the fanatical and malignant rabble, let him who is innocent cast the first stone. And if this christian historian hid ever known or felt the benignant spirit of holy inspiration, would he not be sensible that he was not that innocent? If he be innocent then are tigers gentle. If Mrs. Bonnevillo were as guilty as he no later than this day proposed to prove her, was there no better way to recommend the christian faith than by upbraiding her with such pert and comumcious malice? But when we prove her innocent, when she comes from out the hery furnace unhurt, unscorched, then " the more angel she, and he the blacker devil"

But it is said he acted Lona fide. He made inquiry and was deceived. And being an Aistorian, is justified even for the blasphomies he this day uttered by his counsel's lips. If this be so, much as I love this country, admire its people, and revere its laws, I would rather once more tempt my wandering destinies than live where one historian was unpenned unmuszied or unchained. I had rather be exposed to some deformed thing with claws, and horns, and tusks : some spita e dragon whose breath was poisonous whose tooth was cankered. Tell me of all the monsters that afficient history or fable treats of; of harpies, hydras, Cale-donian bears, of Minetanes and Pythons, of Gorgons and Chimeras, of fierce and ferocious animals that prowl the desert or fright the haunts of men, and I will tell you of a more fearful monster-that ts, an historian! If every man that keeps the worst of company, that goes about to hunt for lies & scandal, whose organic & natural per perceptions are turned to wickedness, whose scent is fitted only to run the track of slander; if such an one be an historian, and may vend in open market the scandal he runs down; better that letters never had been known, printing invented nor history composed.

The plagues that accident or nature bring must be endured; the evils with which an angry providence sometimes thinks fit to scourge the sinful sons o maninust besubmitted to with reverence and pieus resignation; but that a common libeller should be invested with more than kingly power and prerogative, to what I never heard of.
